

Girls Tell of Wild Parties In Soldiers' 'Love Nests'

DES MOINES, IA., Oct. 28 (By U. P.).—Barrack "love nests" at Fort Des Moines are under police investigation because of stories by two girls that the military reservation was frequently used for "wild parties."

Two soldiers at Fort Des Moines were held for investigation because of charges of the two girls, whose names were withheld, that they had attended all night parties in the barracks and at a house near the fort.

The girls disappeared from their homes last Thursday, and an exhaustive search has been made for them. They were found by detectives in company of Ernest Barnhouse and Thomas Tullio of Company E, Seventeenth Infantry.

The girls are alleged to have told police they spent Saturday and Sunday nights with soldiers in a cook shack inside the fort.

Between the time of their disappearance and their capture they also stayed with soldiers in the house outside the military reservation, police said.

had gone to visit a cemetery in South River.

Ciecuch, after suggesting that Denton begin the work, agreed to go to South River and return with Yorstion. Denton called his 15-year-old son, Charles, Jr. Both seized spades and began digging, and Ciecuch departed.

Soon a morbid crowd collected. The Dentons, father and son, became the butt of ghoulish jokes as they grimly set to work. One circulated a report that the wrong grave was being opened.

A rowdy hurled a rock high into the air. The missile struck a bystander in the head, knocking him unconscious.

Rev. E. W. Hall

The victim was rushed to a hospital in the taxicab of a newspaper man.

A man who introduced himself as an executive of the local S. P. C. A. arrived to view the activities. He objected, a friend explained, to the gravediggers killing earth worms and small snakes as they progressed.

Woman Berates Reporters

Reporters scurried to surround two women who had entered the cemetery. One of them was Mrs. Augusta Tenneson, sister of Mrs. Mills. The other, mounting a tombstone, ranted angrily at the scribes. She was not a member of the Mills family, she said, but she was the cemetery sexton's wife, Mrs. Yorstion.

ston, with a perfect right to be present.

Soon flashlights boomed, Denton, Pere and Fils, grinning widely over their newly bestowed popularity, were photographed in every variety of pose.

Soon the gravediggers struck the wooden box that contained the remains of Mrs. Mills. They halted work, erected a small derrick and looked about for further instructions.

Then, glancing at his watch, the younger Denton observed it was 4.30. He was a union gravedigger, he declared, and his day was ended. Seizing his hat and coat, he disappeared.

While the elder Denton gazed about in bewilderment and apologized for his impetuous son, Yorstion returned to the cemetery. Ciecuch was not with him.

When he beheld the opened grave with its freshly dug earth piled high alongside, Yorstion berated Denton. Who had told him to dig the grave? Why had he proceeded without permission from his boss? It was a grave infraction of gravedigging ethics.

Then Jack Bowman, North Brunswick chief of police, with an old-fashioned horse pistol thrust into his belt, arrived with Deputies Marsh Fuston and Bill Howland. A fellow named Underwood, later
